

Remember that show about Carrie, Charlotte, Miranda and their Mom?

"Let's Get Laid", a webseries launching February 17, is not your standard pre-menopausal sex comedy. The series centers around Melissa and Jenn, two entertainment assistants, who are klutzing their way through the Los Angeles dating scene; the land of ridiculously high expectations. Unlike their New York matriarch counterparts, the duo is broke (one still lives with her folks) and are looking for Mr. Right Now rather than Mr. Right.

An antidote to the douchiness of "Entourage," and the excess of "City," you root for these two neophytes in their freshman year of the real world. Why? Unlike their pay-tv counterparts, these two have to fight for what they want. Nothing is handed to them. The only home furnishing between the two of them is an oft watered house plant that doubles as a pet.

In its boldness, "Let's Get Laid" doesn't shy away from the bigotries that are a large part of entertainment industry and its employees. At the top of their dating hierarchy are European fancy boys and BBCs (big, black cocks). The lower rung is made of up Koreatownies and Texans.

Melissa Hunter and Jenn Kron, entertainment assistants themselves, wrote, produced and raised the cash for the show. In most circumstances, web tv makers go with the cliched, reality format as way to save money and hide their lack of technical talent. The two have decided to go against the grain and have put together polished, pro look.

Web TV: LET'S GET LAID

Written by Dave Howard

Until the show premieres, you can see some VERY funny additional scenes on their You Tube Channel.

Definitely worth checking out, go "Get Laid!"